Elizabeth represents clients in high-stakes litigation across the country, including commercial disputes, product defects claims, and consumer fraud and securities fraud class actions.

Across a diverse range of industries and a variety of claims, Elizabeth has helped companies and individuals achieve impactful results in state and federal litigation and appeals. Applying creative strategies and her 15 years of jury trial experience, she has helped clients defend against class actions in jurisdictions across the country, respond to workplace injuries and fatalities, successfully defend against shareholder actions, and resolve complex business disputes.

She has counseled companies and their officers and directors on matters involving billions of dollars in potential exposure.

Elizabeth also regularly represents special committees of public companies during internal investigations of alleged regulatory violations and executive misconduct matters.

For each client, Elizabeth listens carefully to stakeholders and approaches litigation with a strong focus on the broader business strategy surrounding a dispute or claim. She keenly understands that litigation is a tool, not an end result, and strives to develop innovative solutions that align with a client's business needs.

In a major pro bono effort covered by The New York Times, The Atlantic and ProPublica, Elizabeth represents thousands of female sexual assault survivors in a federal class action against the Austin Police Department and the Travis County District Attorney's Office over alleged failures in the investigation and prosecution of sexual assaults. In conjunction with her work on the lawsuit, Elizabeth worked alongside survivor advocacy groups to successfully petition Texas lawmakers to pass $80 million in funding and new laws focused on improving the investigation and prosecution of sexual assault across Texas.

Elizabeth is involved with multiple initiatives related to human trafficking and child advocacy, and sits on the Board of Directors for the Equality Texas Foundation, which works to secure full equality for LGBTQ Texans through education and community organizing.
