Jack has a wide range of public policy and strategic communications experience in regional and international law firms and public affairs firms, where he has worked with clients on diverse matters related to emerging energy technologies, natural resources and environmental management, cannabis, municipal government, and education policy.

His clients benefit from his detailed understanding of their business models and his knowledge of their market differentiators to more effectively engage Congress and the administration.

For nearly 20 years, Jack has represented corporations, coalitions, municipal governments, nonprofit organizations, and associations before federal, state, and local governments and policymakers. His clients have included a major U.S. city, a natural gas research consortium, a major energy efficiency manufacturing company, an international telecommunications company, and a public power system.

Jack's experience aids his clients as they navigate the intersection of public policy, advocacy, and communications. He most recently worked at a global law and policy firm, where he assisted national and international clients in raising issues before federal agencies and Congress and sought comprehensive solutions to his clients' problems. Prior to that, he lobbied on behalf of one of the premier federal lobbying firms in Washington.

As a senior account executive for public affairs at a global public relations firm, Jack used his creative problem-solving skills to influence congressional and state policy initiatives. He coordinated media campaigns, provided government relations advice, and developed outreach plans focused on increasing client visibility and proactively positioning clients in key reputation areas. Prior to that, he was a lobbyist at a boutique energy and environmental lobbying firm specializing in public power, natural gas, and nuclear issues. His well-rounded experience from various angles is a great benefit to his clients.
