Rob is a pragmatic, solution-oriented advisor who guides companies through major transactions as well as provides comprehensive advice on their day-to-day operations and business needs.

He has particular experience working with complex domestic and international mergers and acquisitions transactions, supply chain matters, sophisticated data protection issues and software licensing and implementations.

For nearly two decades, Rob has worked closely with the leaders and in-house legal teams of a variety of domestic and international businesses — from entrepreneurs to multi-billion-dollar international conglomerates, particularly in the manufacturing and high-tech sectors. These companies look to Rob for practical, real-world advice on the myriad of issues they face.

Rob has extensive experience in supply chain management, both domestic and internationally, and assists companies with contracts and conflicts that crop up while buying, supplying or transporting all manner of goods.

Additionally, Rob devotes a large part of his practice to information security and records management issues. He drafts, reviews, and audits information management policies and procedures, and helps companies create strong internal programs for electronic discovery, data breach procedures, and information preservation. A former computer programmer who also developed and sold large-volume software solutions, Rob draws on his tech background to ensure his clients are protected when purchasing and implementing business-critical software or embarking on technology transfers.

Rob is a longtime drone hobbyist and the co-chair of Thompson Coburn's UAS (Drone) Practice Group, where he counsels a variety of companies on their use of UAS.
