Ryan is a problem-solver who works to create opportunities for clients dealing with environmental and energy issues, property disputes, commercial litigation, and government regulation and public policy matters. He has been recognized by the St. Louis Business Journal for his legal and community work in the St. Louis region.

For over a decade, Ryan has represented clients in litigation, regulatory and transactional matters arising under the full spectrum of federal, state, and local environmental laws. He has successfully handled permit proceedings, civil and criminal enforcement actions, administrative appeals, and a variety of lawsuits throughout the country. His clients include publicly-held companies, utilities, railroads, agricultural services companies, health care providers, cities, nonprofits, and privately held businesses.

Ryan's work for his clients involves a strategic approach that draws on his political and legislative experience at the Congressional and statehouse levels. After establishing a client's ultimate objectives, Ryan identifies the most effective tools for a given issue and then applies those tools in smart and timely ways throughout the matter, whether pursuing negotiation or mediation, marshaling external pressure, initiating government involvement, or engaging in litigation.

Ryan's environmental and energy practice has recently included particular experience with Clean Air Act matters. He has negotiated Title V operating permits, secured state and local construction permits, filed permit and other administrative appeals, drafted comments on various regulations including proposed MACT standards, and represented clients in investigations and enforcement throughout the country. He has also secured favorable regulatory decisions from the EPA for clients with complicated mobile source emissions issues. Additionally, Ryan advises clients with regard to climate change preparedness and sustainability.

In his property practice, Ryan currently handles indemnity and other cost-recovery suits as well as litigation regarding commercial sale and lease agreements. He also advises construction firms and developers on land
